Recent neuroscience research reveals a profound truth: The relentless pursuit of wealth and success, often celebrated, can lead to significant emotional and psychological distress. This comprehensive study involving over 400 individuals delves into the greed personality trait (GPT) and its emotional impacts. It uncovers that high levels of GPT correlate with increased depression, anger, and aggression. This correlation extends beyond behavior to the brain's structure, as neuroimaging data indicates significant impacts on specific brain regions in those with higher greed traits.

The greedy person's brain and the domino effect

Participants with higher GPT scores not only reported more negative emotions but also exhibited distinct neural patterns. Neuroimaging revealed that regions associated with emotion regulation, decision-making, and empathy showed distinct patterns of activation in these individuals. This suggests that greed can fundamentally alter brain function, leading to a heightened propensity for negative emotions.
